
ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

In the first place, I thank the authorities of the Sociedad Argentina de Coloproctología who have conferred on me the honor of addressing this Lectureship, on a subject of undoubted topicality and maximum interest for our specialty. Without a doubt, this designation constitutes one of the greatest responsibilities that I have had to assume in my academic career, and also the greatest recognition that a surgeon can receive. But if something is clear to me, it is that this achievement is not something personal, but is shared with many people who have trained, enriched and helped me throughout my life. I am grateful to my parents who taught me, forged my personality and gave me access to an education that opened doors for me. To all my teachers, among whom I especially remember Claudio Barredo and Jorge Covaro, who from my beginnings at the J. M. Penna Hospital allowed me to develop my projects and shared the task with tolerance. To all the staff doctors and residents with whom I shared so many years of my hospital and out-of-hospital practice. To Romina Bianchi, with whom we have formed a true work team that redefined my career, who insisted me to face this challenge and supported me unconditionally. This work also belongs to her. To colleagues with whom I did not share the work but I did exchange ideas and they enriched me with their own experience and their various approaches. To sensei Yoshihiro Moriya and the colorectal surgery team at the National Cancer Center Hospital in Tokyo, who in 2003 definitely transmit me an interest in rectal cancer. To Enrique Roca, Adriana Diéguez, Martín Eleta and all the colleagues who make up the Co-Recto, with a special mention to Dr. Guillermo Méndez. To all the specialists who have researched and published on this topic; to patients, the reason for our profession; to my family, Marta, Dolores, Pilar and Josefina, who for so many years had to endure my absences with love and generosity and without complaint.
